Early Care and Education Mimi Howard,2008 This issue of The Progress of Education Reform addresses the policies and practices associated with sustaining school readiness and boosting achievement for young children throughout the early elementary years All three studies support the notion that an aligned and coordinated set of policies and practices linking early learning with the early elementary grades will maximize a return on investments and help ensure later academic success Policymakers and educators continue to grapple with issues of persistent achievement gaps in student performance at grade 3 and beyond As they do they are looking for ways to create a more seamless system of education that assures young people s education is connected from one stage to the next reducing the chances that students will be lost along the way or require remedial programs to acquire skills or knowledge they could have learned right from the start State policymakers are beginning now to look for ways to fill the gap in education policy and practice that links school readiness efforts and school improvement efforts Policymakers face three key questions 1 Where does an expanded education continuum begin at birth at age 3 or at some other critical point in a child s development 2 How do we effectively create linkages between and across early education and early elementary school programs and 3 What characteristics of an elementary school have the capacity to sustain and increase children s learning in the early grades Each of the works reviewed in this paper addresses one or more of these questions While there is no right answer each paper provides readers with options and opportunities that may help focus their own unique education policy and practice priorities Contains 3 endnotes
